A 'builder artist' who is also a bit of a stuntman, Claude Cattelain is a video artist, performance artist, draughtsman, and designer of installations and photographs. His development has been quite atypical: in succession, he has dismantled the stretchers of his canvases (in 1999 already), built unstable constructions (in 2000), and bought a camera to film his failures, footage that he would later develop in his practice as a performance artist. Creaking, breathing, the sound of footsteps, scrap metal, banging or rubbing noises, but also repetitions: these are all words that resonate in the artist's approach.

Through various experiments – such as holding planks up against a wall by means of heavy steel bars, raising his body between the walls of a corridor using cleats, hanging in space, spinning like a whirling dervish, sweeping the waves, walking on the spot for many hours to create drawings or videos in which he sinks into the sand until his feet become eroded – Claude Cattelain tests his body and materials in order to question their limits and identify their breaking points and their inscription in the space. He practises three types of actions, all of which take shape over a certain length of time: those that are performed in the presence of the public, those that allow him to build a structure that he will leave in the space, and those that he films. ## Hervé Charles

Hervé Charles explores the ambiguity of photographic representation, mainly through landscapes, and in particular through natural landscapes undergoing a brutal transformation.

His current work focuses on two types of natural disasters: mega forest fires and floods.

His concerns being both photographic and ecological, these themes are approached in a way that is both dreamlike and captivating. His large-format pictures play on the viewer's immersion in these devastated places, a magnificence of these areas of desolation that nevertheless contain the possibility of a renewal or else that contain pockets of resistance: awareness of the anticipated disaster without being a manifesto.

The original pictures were taken up close, the artist being unafraid of confrontation and advocating the experience of shots in direct relation to the referent: ecstatic field photography.
